In the printing and paper-handling arts, it is common practice to run two webs of material along parallel paths so as to provide for simultaneous transfer of ink from a web of ink material to a web of paper, and to provide for simultaneous transfer of ink from a web of paper to a web of inking material. This is typically accomplished by having a single continuous path over which the two webs are transported, but with separate path portions for the inking material and the paper. In some devices the two webs are carried along the path portion by gripper structures which are spaced therealong, so that the webs move along separate path portions while being held in spaced relationship. The webs may also be supported over the paths in spaced relationship, by separate air cylinders which act on the webs independently of one another. While the above-described apparatus is functional for its intended purpose, it does not permit simultaneous inking of both webs. Further, in the web handling arts the handling of the webs may require different procedures for different handling operations. For example, a web of inking material may have to be impregnated in certain areas of the web, while having certain areas of the web untreated. Further, in the printing art, there may be provided printing of both 82157476af
